RESEARCH

General Description

Research interests: primarily moral philosophy (applied ethics and metaethics), but also aesthetics (philosophy of art, philosophy of beauty), epistemology (skepticism and common sense, theories of sense perception), history of philosophy (concentrating on ancient Greek philosophy, British philosophy of the 18th century, and German philosophy of the 18th and 19th century), various philosophers (Hume, Kant, Mill, Schopenhauer, William James, A.N. Whitehead, G.E. Moore).

Recent Research Projects (since 2005)

Biotechnology and the Integrity of Life - It is a common idea among scientists and philosophers that medical research and medical practices can only be wrong if they increase the suffering of living beings. However, there are things that can be done and are done to living beings which apparently do not involve or produce any suffering on their side and which are still considered to be morally wrong by a large proportion of the public. Often when such concerns are expressed, they are rejected on the grounds that there is no rational basis for them. Yet some attempts have been made to give these concerns a philosophical foundation by introducing the term "integrity" into the debate. The term "integrity" has long been used to denote a certain moral quality in persons, but today the concept is being applied also to animals, plants, landscapes, and ecosystems. The aim of the project was to find out how the term "integrity" has come to signify a morally relevant property of living beings, when this usage started, on what lines it has evolved and how this change in reference has affected the meaning of the concept. The result is a book that was published in November 2007 by Ashgate (Biotechnology and the Integrity of Life), which gives a systematic account of the concept of integrity, its history, and its usage and function in current ethical debates on the moral legitimacy of certain kinds of biomedical research and practice.

Transhumanism and the Philosophy of Human Enhancement – Since 2007 I have been looking into current transhumanist philosophies, their key ideas, and the history of these ideas. Key transhumanist ideas are human self-design, the elimination of all suffering, the achievement of perfection and immortality, and the complete defeat of (human) nature. In order to understand these ideas better and to be able to evaluate them properly I've looked into their history, followed their development and identified their mythological status. The object was to gain clarity about what we as human beings are, what we want to, or ought to, become, and what technological advances are worth striving for. This strand of my research resulted in more than 15 papers and four books, Better Humans? Understanding the Enhancement Project, which was published in April 2013 by Acumen (now Routledge), Sex and the Posthuman Condition (Palgrave Macmillan 2014), The Palgrave Handbook of Posthumanism in Film and Television (ed., Palgrave Macmillan 2015), and Mythologies of Transhumanism (Palgrave Macmillan 2016).

Death and Meaning – I recently started with this new project, which follows up on some of the ideas that I developed in the context of the human enhancement debate. It has been argued that death undercuts meaning, in the sense that as long as our lives will have to end someday our lives cannot be meaningful. That certainly plays a part in why death is often perceived as the greatest evil: not merely because it sets an end to our life, but because it renders all we do meaningless. It is for this reason that we need to do everything in our power to stop the presently inevitable decline of our bodies and to extend human lifespan indefinitely. Yet there is also the opposite view that, far from taking the meaning out of life, death, or mortality, is a precondition of a meaningful life, so that an immortal life would necessarily be devoid of meaning. Now obviously death cannot be both a precondition of a meaningful life and an obstacle to it. So which is it? In order to find out, we need to answer several questions, beginning with what exactly we mean when we talk about meaning, but also in what way the fact that we have to die can be thought to undercut meaning. But we must also ask whether life will inevitably become meaningless in an indefinitely extended life. Can we see the value in things only if they are fragile and bound to perish? Why should it be necessary for life to have not only a beginning, but also an end? Would that imply that for the world as a whole to have meaning, it too will have to end one day? And why should we need a final purpose, instead of an open-ended sequence of purposes to find meaning in life? The project intends to answer these questions.
